

March 22, 2020 Update

Online and Remote Instruction Begins Monday

On Monday, Florida A&M University begins the first day of online and remote instruction, which will continue for the remainder of the spring semester.

“As FAMU transitions to online classes and alternative instructional delivery on Monday, March 23, I want to thank our faculty and staff who have worked tirelessly during this coronavirus pandemic to make sure our students are able to continue to succeed in their respective academic programs,” said President Larry Robinson, Ph.D. “We also encourage our students to take full advantage of this opportunity to pursue their academic goals.”

Students should visit the Instruction, Advisement, Student Success section on the FAMU.edu/coronavirus webpage for information regarding online instruction.

In preparation for the transition, as of Friday, March 20, the University distributed 160 laptops to equip faculty for remote and online instruction. Another 40 computers will be distributed in the next few days. Resources have also been made available for students.

Faculty and staff have also increased their use of telecommuting tools to ensure core business operations are not disrupted.

As a precaution to stem the spread of the coronavirus, the University has instructed staff where possible to work remotely until April 6.

The University remains open and operational with appropriate measures to protect the health of the community. This page will be updated regularly with the latest advisories and alerts from the University.